Three Words. There are three lessons I would write-Three words as with a burning pen, In 'racing of eternal light-

Upon the hearts of men. Have Hope! Though clouds environ round, And gladness hides her face in scorn; Pu' thou the shadow from thy brow;

No night but hath its morn! Have Faith! Where'er their bark is driven, The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth; Know this: God rules the hosts of Heaven. The inhabitants of earth.

Have Love! Not love alone for one, But mao, as man, thy brother call, And scatter like the circling sun, Thy charities on all.

Thus grave these lessons on thy soul-

Strength when life's surges rudest roll,

Light when thou else wert blind! Lost in a Canon.

Hope, Faith and Love -and thou shalt find

Louis Cohn, who is connected with post traderships in the Northwest, has just arrived at Chicago, and tells a story of almost unexampled suffering. He came direct from Fort Keogh, which is situated on the Yellowstone river. Mr. Cohn descended the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers to B smarck on a small steamer that had delivered a cargo of military supplies at Keogh. The "June freshet." as it is termed, was on at the time, and the Yellowstone was swollen to bursting. In the gorges, where, on account of the perpendicular walls of rock-in places a thousand feet high-the torrent could not spend its enormous force in overthrow, the current had apparently a force of thirty miles an hour. One evening, as the boat was emerging from one of the parrowest cagons in the river, a man named Riche, a Frenchman, who was working as a roustabout to pay for his passage to the post, caught his foot in a rope, and, stumbling, pitched over the guard into the water. Ha wasn't much of a mariner, nor was he swimmer enough to cope with a current as tumultuous as the Yellowstone; so, while as a swimmer he didn't make any perceptible headway, as a floater he made wonderful time. Of course the orew made a show of trying to rescue the poor Frechman, but the pilot had too fresh a sense of the difficulties of pavigation in that region to think of dropping back down the canon after having nearly worn out a boiler and engine in getting through it. So, in ten seconds, more or less, the man overboard had been swept down into the neck of the gorge, and soon disappeared altogether from view. Thirteen days from that time, at about the same hour in the evening, the steamer, on its return trip, with a large cargo of pelts, shot down through that same canon at a fearful rate of speed, the current alone without the help of steam, carrying the light craft with lightning-like velocity. In the deepest part of the gorge, upon a patch of beach that seemed to have been formed of the debris perpetually drap. ping from the stupendous walls of granite, a man was espied in the attitude of signaling the boat to stop. For signal he used his flannel shirt. As soon as possible the boat was brought to a landing near by where the man was stand-

In the meantime the stranger-no, not the stranger, for, despite his changed appearance. he was instantly recognized by every man of the crew-had fallen into a limpsy heap upon the strip of beach. This man was Riche, the "roustabout," who, to the amazement of his resours, had survived the dive and dash through the perilous canon, and, by no particular effort of his own, had stranded on the beggarly patch of rocky beach, with a terrible river on two sides of him and granite walls on the other two sides. He remembered falling overboard, and, more vividly still, he remembered rolling up safely on the rocks, somewhat bruised and with throat and nostrile gorged with water, but he could give no idea of the time spent in the water, nor the number of days that had elapsod since the crew had cruelly abandoned om to his fate.

Mr. Cohn says that Riche's condition was wretched to the last extreme. When found and taken aboard the boat ne could not articulate his words intelligibly. He had taken nothing but river water into his stomach during the thirteen days of his isolation. When, under the judi-cious application of stimulating food, he was restored sufficiently to be able to converse, he told them that his only hope had been that a steamer would come along and that he would be able to make himself discovered. As the ninching pange of starvation increased, he would lie for hours with ear close to the water, momentarily imagining that he could hear the pulsations of a ateamer breasting and braving the rapids.

After a few days his stomach rejected water.

and as that was the best and only offering he had to give it was forced to feed upon itself, and it was doing this at a ruinously rapid rate when succor came. Biche, who apparently has been a man of 160 pounds weight, was a skeleton when rescued, and had not strength enough to life both hands to his face at once. He said that several time fine, large trout disported themselves in the shallows at his feet, and once he threw himself sprawling into the water and thrust his hand along the graveled bottom in the hope of clutching one of the fish, but they cluded his grasp, and he was left to the d spairing reflection that there were millions of fish within reach and not even a minnow to eat
